President of First State Bank; Recognized as Banking Leader In This Section
FUNERAL TUESDAY

Charles A. Dugan, 73, president of the First State Bank, leading citizen and a former city school superintendent, prominent in midwest banking circles and one of the most successful bank executives in Indiana, died at his home, 420 W. Monroe street at 7:30 this morning of a heart attack.

Mr. Dugan had been in poor health for a few years. He suffered from asthma and the state of his health depended largely on climatic conditions. Regardless of his affliction and suffering, his interest in the business life of the community and his undying love for his work, carried him to his desk early every day. Last Wednesday his condition became worse and about noon he retired to his home. It was his last day at the bank.

At his bedside when death occurred, were members of the family and a local physician.
