THE RETURN OF THE NATIVE

Nothing in Princeton High appeared greatly altered—
 A queer new bulletin-board perched on the side of the hallway;
 Some of the desks now had the new-fangled ink wells
 Standing like donjon towers among the unkempt school books
 (Things of romance, those ink-wells, in the evening shadows).
 We sighted a Senior moodily reading his Vergil,
 Hailed him, and brought him reluctant and dour to the present;
 Then in a vein historico-sentimental
 We told of our youth passed in his beautiful schoolhouse:
 He shifted his gum and never batted an eyelash.
 Whereat we began to revert to the tales of our school-days—
 Spoke of the good old days now beyond the ramparts
 Of this uneasy plant forever flitted,
 Spoke of the freshmen kids and their fresher manners.
 Wooden he sat as the desk on which he was leaning.
 But when we tried to open the door in departing
 And the door refused (the lock having been turned by the Freshmen,)
 Then he awoke—then at last we had reached him—
 Had found a motif to which his nature responded;
 A lopsided grin illumined his face as he shouted:
 "Now ye've got back, ye thought ye'd stay awhile, didn't ye?"
